

Supporting Information

Electrical current generation in microbial electrolysis cells by hyperthermophilic archaea Ferroglobus placidus and Geoglobus ahangari

Yasemin D. Yilmazel,^{1,2,*} Xiuping Zhu,^{2,3} Kyoung-Yeol Kim,² Dawn E. Holmes,⁴
Bruce E. Logan²

¹ Department of Chemical Engineering, Rochester Institute of Technology, Rochester,
New York USA

² Department of Civil and Environmental Engineering, The Pennsylvania State
University, University Park, Pennsylvania USA

³ Department of Civil and Environmental Engineering, Louisiana State University, Baton
Rouge, LA 70803

⁴ Department of Biology, Western New England University, Springfield, Massachusetts
USA

*Corresponding author. E-mail: ydyche@rit.edu

Figure S1. SEM image of an electrode surface following growth of F. placidus with acetate as an electron donor (10 mM) under 0.7 V of applied voltage.

Figure S2. SEM image of an electrode surface following growth of G. ahangari with acetate as an electron donor (10 mM) under 0.7 V of applied voltage.